LECTURE I

Introductory

THE crucifixion of Christ the most outstanding fact in history—The purity and sublimity of Christ's character admitted—He is therefore unique, and His mission is exceptional—His own conception of Himself and His mission—His method was sacrificially to give His life a ransom for many—The history of humanity before His advent an unconscious prediction of Him—Sacrifice universal in religion, belief in its efficacy ineradicable, and therefore may be regarded instinctive—The instinct to sacrifice is a typical, a prophetic element—Questions as to the origin of sacrifice and rationale of sacrifice—Leading theories of Spencer, Meade, Sykes, and Warburton referred to; but these are of subordinate importance if it be the fact that sacrifice is an action as natural to man as is prayer, springing from the fountain of religion—The constituents of religion; sense of dependence, reverence, but the sense of affinity with Deity, though often overlooked, is also universal in religion—Difference between belief in this affinity, in the religions of nature, and the faith expressed in the Bible—The aim of religion by means of prayer and sacrifice to improve relations with Deity into communion and fellowship—Nowhere evidence that fearless communion with Deity has been realised, even in Genesis represented as broken; religion and sacrifice intended to reknit it—Our purpose to sketch the salient features of sacrifice in all religions—In the aim or intention of the sacrificer we get the type or the prophecy of sacrifice—In the dispensation of grace, humanity is the unit—What was revealed to the Jew was revealed for the Gentile—Analogies between Jewish and

Gentile sacrifices not so frequent nor so significant as their contrasts—Some of these contrasts noted—The chief contrast is the fact that heathen sacrifices represent the endeavour of man to conciliate Deity, and sacrifice is represented in Scripture as a divinely appointed means of grace whereby Jehovah seeks to save man—These contrasts indicate a providential training of one people for the sake of all mankind—The mystery of the election of the Jew, matched by the fact that the most degraded of Gentiles were maintained in their capacity to receive the Divine revelation of redemption when communicated to them—Illustrations of this to be given in the succeeding lectures Pages 1-56

LECTURE II

Sacrifice as exhibited in Animism and in Lower Polytheism

The terms savage, barbarian, civilised, applied to different sections of mankind, only relative—In civilisation are found many survivals of barbarism furnishing a rich vein for interesting research—The study of savage rites and beliefs not useless, but important and valuable—Difficulty of ascertaining them—A savage's religion a "mystery" in the classical use of the word—His mental condition renders him unable satisfactorily to account for his "customs"—His religion best described by the term Animism—Definition of Animism—The aim of a savage to protect himself against invisible and dangerous powers by his fetish—Fetichism, Shamanism, not religions, though recognising rites and even sacrifice, but wholly based upon magic or sorcery and practised in self-defence—The real religion of a savage is rooted in another belief, expressed by different customs—All comprehended under the term Totemism—Origin of Totemism yet unsolved—Mr. Frazer's hypothesis explained—Totemism as a phase of religion described—Specified animals, different in different clans, sacred, and for the same reason that a clansman is sacred—The blood in its veins is believed to be identical with that of the clan—If not a god in the estimation of a clan, it is divine as the living nexus between the clan and the god—The slightest insult or injury done to it sacrilege—Yet there are occasions when it may be slaughtered though divine, and there are others when it must be sacrificed because it is divine—It must die for the clan to reinforce the life of the clan, yea to preserve all things from death—On such occasions there is always sacramental communion in its flesh and blood—These sacrifices annually connected with the purgation of the land from all the evils of the year—Under most horrible and revolting rites, traces of beliefs which, if not typical, can be utilised for communicating to the most degraded savages the loftiest religious truths—But the savage not the type of heathendom, he rather represents its residuum—Above him there is an ascending series of humanity, the highest representing great culture—Value of the study of the Mexican and Peruvian religions as illustrating the religion of Europe, Asia, Egypt, in ancient prehistoric ages—Superior to Animism—Worship of the most imposing physical forces and phenomena personified not in zoomorphic, but anthropomorphic forms—Human sacrifice accounted for by the old animistic belief—Victims offered because divine, or because transubstantiated into divinities; also sacramentally partaken of,—“The god who is eaten”—Peruvian ritual purer; worship of the sun; the theocracy of the Inca; animal sacrifice daily; human sacrifices on rare occasions—Crowning act of religion—Sacramental communion of the Inca with his court, then with the whole people once a year in sacred cakes and liquor—The Peruvian vestal virgins or nuns—Astonishment of the Spaniards at these and other resemblances to their own religious institutions—Application to our subject. . . . LECTURE III

Sacrifice as Exhibited in Higher Polytheism

Religions superior to Mexican and Peruvian; represented by immense literatures containing the history, philosophy, and theology of peoples very ancient—In them the history of religious thought not shown to be always one of progress—Diversity of opinion as to their actual antiquity, and the relative antiquity of their several parts—Notably the case in regard to the Vedas, Avestas, and so-called sacred books of Chaldea; danger of employing them in support of any theory as to the origin and growth of religious conceptions; yet all very valuable as exhibiting very ancient and widespread beliefs and practices—In all, sacrifice is an essential part of worship, yet in none of them is it a means of grace—A device for securing self-advancement—In Persia and China offering of sacrifice limited only to the good—In most of them sacrificial slaughter not extravagant—Explanation of this—Belief in transmigration, and in that of the infusion of the divine soul into animals—Indian

beliefs akin to Egyptian—Indian belief in efficacy of self-torture deeply rooted ; how accounted for—In polytheism of higher types, always two religions—Along with the popular religion, an esoteric faith, the religion of the thoughtful—Sacrificial worship of an ancient Brahman householder described—Its highest action or function, communion with the gods in the enlightening Soma sacrifice—Shraddha or funeral rites described—Difference between the ancient Iranian sacrifices and the Indian—In Iran sacrifice not so much an act of worship as a service rendered in extending the kingdom of Ahura—Sacrifice of no use to atone or expiate sin according to the Avesta—The highest sacrificial ceremony in China described ; sacramental communion of the living with the departed in the Hall of Ancestors—Egyptian religion attractive because greatly concerned with what of human life lies beyond death—The Book of the Dead—Sinister influence exercised by the Egyptian religion upon the development of Christian theology and ritual—Powerful influence of Egypt upon Rome, and especially Greece—The higher religion of Greece expressed in “the mysteries”—In all these religions no atoning efficacy in sacrifices in our sense of the word—Sacrifice piacular to affect the working of the cosmos, and in the stage of belief represented by the many forms of Baal worship, to appease or keep friendly deities who would rather injure than help men—Revolt of the higher minds of Greece from such conceptions—The gods of Æschylos and Sophocles, strict guardians of justice—Belief in the retributive law symbolised in the Erinnyes, co-existing with faith in the efficacy of sacrifice to atone for blood-guiltiness—How the Erinnyes would become to the suppliant the Eumenides—Impossible for man to work out his own redemption—Plato’s conception—His approach to Christianity—In what sense he and many others may be called παιδαγωγοὶ εἰς Χριστόν

LECTURE IV

Sacrifice as exhibited in the Hebrew Bible—Patriarchal and Mosaic Sacrifice

The relation of the Gospel to the Law an illustration of the relation of Old Testament to the higher religions of polytheism—Old Testament refines what of other religions it has assumed—Coincidences between traditions and ceremonies in other religions with those described in Old Testament undeniable—Yet the Old Testament is original in regard to the use to which materials that are common to all are put—Bible as we have it begins at a higher point than other religions ever reached—The best minds in some of them attained to pantheism, even theism—Bible starts with monotheism, and every tradition and every rite is utilised to express or enforce or illustrate ethical or spiritual truth—The Sabbath an illustration; also sacrifice, which, taken for granted as a natural part of religion gets quite a new significance—A divinely appointed or sanctioned means of grace—Of one form of sacrifice recorded in Genesis it may be said “The Lord sanctified and blessed it”—Abel’s sacrifice in faith contrasted with Cain’s “heathen” one—Noah’s sacrifice explained—First mention of a Divine “covenant”; the word anthropomorphic, but the idea to be suggested by it is spiritual—Co-operation of Divine and human agency required in evolving a scheme of redemption from the primeval curse—Series of “covenants” recorded—Their design to instruct man that redemption can only be obtained by trustful surrender to Divine will, and by hearty acceptance of the Divine method—Covenant with Abraham—Its seal and pledge, circumcision—Heathen circumcision contrasted with the Hebrew rite—The test of Abraham’s fidelity to the covenant in the sacrifice of his son—How in the light shed on it by the Gospel it fits in naturally with this stage in the history of revelation—The covenant with the nation, in Egypt; its seal the passover—Heathen and Biblical passovers differentiated—The passover only an inauguration of the Covenant ceremonial; its conclusion at Sinai after the giving of “the Law”—The Covenant sacramental feast—The aim of the Covenant, to constitute the holy nation for the blessing of all mankind—New Testament interpretation of the Passover and Covenant sacrifices Pages 178-280

LECTURE V

Sacrifice as exhibited in the Hebrew Bible—Mosaic and Levitical Sacrifice

The legislation generally described as Mosaic in the Pentateuch can only in regard to fundamentals be ascribed to the Mosaic Age—Leviticus as we now have it, a late production, the work not of one man nor of one age, but the outcome of the experience of many generations—It must have been built, however, on some very archaic institutions—Theory formulated in the Pentateuch that the prophet of the religion of Jehovah laid the foundations of the publicworship of Israel in a sanctuary, priesthood, and sacrificial ritual, a reasonable one—The institutions were all required for the maintenance of the covenant—All such as Moses could originate and provide out of such resources as the tribes then commanded—All as now described founded on monotheist beliefs, and designed to guard against tendency to physiolatry and polytheism—Difference between the tabernacle and Egyptian temples—Description of the tabernacle, its intention or design clearly indicated by its designations and by the symbolism of its construction, furniture, and uses—The New Testament interpretation of its typical import—The priesthood no graft from the religion of Egypt, though idea probably suggested by it—The development of the priesthood and the Levitical order in Israel according to Scripture was gradual—Its original intention essentially contrasted with that of the Egyptian priesthood; designed not to fence off, but to draw the people near to Jehovah—A priest in Israel only holy because of his consecration to office—This clearly indicated by the ceremonials for the ordination of the priests and of the high priest and for “the purification of the sons of Levi”—Failure of the priesthood to fulfil the ideal of their vocation—Application of this fact by the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews—The sacrificial system described in the Pentateuch as essentially symbolic, based upon confession of sin, repentance, desire for reconciliation—The intention of the authors of the last edition of Pentateuch to represent it as the natural development of patriarchal worship, and as acceptable only when offered in the spirit of Abel, Noah, and Abraham—Founded in belief in necessity for atonement; blood peculiarly sacrosanct; its application a symbol well understood—A sacrifice described—Different kinds of sacrifices explained; the root idea in all the same—Necessity for atonement emphasised in the sin and trespass offerings; their significance and intention explained—All that Levitical religion could effect or embody summed up in the “Day of Atonements”—Description in Leviticus of its ceremonial refers to a late period in the history of Israel, but the day and its peculiar rites very ancient—Description of the ceremonial in its most salient, symbolic, and typical features; peculiar application of the blood of the sin offerings; the sending away of the other half of the sacrifice—La Azazel—Special feature in all cases of atoning sacrifice—That atonement was not demanded from the tribes, but provided for them and given to them by

Jehovah—A Divine suggestion therefore of the way by which a broken covenant might be renewed Pages 231-290

LECTURE VI

The Prophecy of Sacrifice fulfilled in Christ

Sacrificial worship even when used in faith as a means of grace could only have pacified the conscience in a certain stage of experience—The ritual, manifestly insufficient, pointed forward to a more satisfying faith—Indications of this more frequent in the teaching of the prophets; all these connected with belief in the Messiah—First gleams of Messianic hope in Genesis; clearest in the call of Abraham—In Mosaic age the nation believed to be the Messiah in whom all were to be blessed—On the failure of the theocracy to fulfil the idea, the hope centred in a "son of David"—Monarchy proved as great a failure as the theocracy—Necessity for the Exile to purify and spiritualise "the hope"—The "holy remnant"; its ideal personified in the "servant of Jehovah"—His prophet, but rejected, despised, bearing the sins of many—The influence of Isaiah in maturing the faith of John Baptist; his testimony to Jesus "the Lamb of God" given in the spirit and power of Isaiah—Christ's testimony to Himself and His mission given in the spirit and power of the sacrificed "servant of Jehovah"—Baptist's application of the whole atoning sacrificial system in one word to Jesus—Christ's application of the sacrificial symbolism to Himself, but always with a far higher import than a Jew would have conceived—Instances in the Synagogue at Capernaum in the discourse upon "The bread of God"; at the last passover, "Lo my body! lo my blood shed for many!"—The fulfiller of the new covenant promised by Jeremiah—Christ's faith alone explains His conduct which led to His capture, condemnation, crucifixion—Apostolic testimonies uniformly point to Christ the Divine sacrifice—St. Peter, St. Paul, the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, St. John—The revelation of the Divine sacrifice summed up and completed in "The Lamb slain from the foundation of the world"—Distinction between the fact of the Divine sacrifice and the theories devised to explain it—Many theories may be required to account for it, but the life of the Church is nourished by faith in the fact—The revelation of the fact final, but its interpretation

progressive and is still proceeding—Attempt to sketch the faith in the Divine sacrifice as held by the Church to-day after so many centuries of Divine teaching—I. The necessity for the sacrifice: the estrangement of the creature fallen from the holiness and blessedness of God the Creator, but in no case from the Creator's faithfulness; various relations in which God may be conceived as standing to man—Sovereign—Judge bound to maintain universal order; theories founded in these conceived relations true, as far as they go, but all inadequate—God also Creator and Father of the spirits of men, upon whom therefore the weight of their sin was sure to fall most heavily—The Divine sacrifice rooted in the faithful Creator's love for His sinful creatures—II. The nature of that sacrifice: the Divine passion for sin as intolerable; the Holiest taking its burden—This fact in the eternal nature revealed in the mission and sacrifice of Christ—Suffering of no account in the sacrifices of the Law; of primary import in the sacrifice of the Gospel—Christ's sufferings what? due to His sinlessness and to His sympathy—His agony and passion the culmination of His realisation of the significance of sin, heart-broken under the load—He alone knew what sin means, alone could confess it, alone feel its full weight and curse, alone could glorify God in His Divine condemnation of sin, and was glorified of God in consequence as the Redeemer of the race which He was not ashamed to call His brethren—III. The effect of the Divine sacrifice: "the remission of sin," not of its penal consequences—Scripture meaning of forgiveness—Sin only remitted when covered, made an end of—Negative effect of the Divine sacrifice to condemn sin in the flesh, destroy the sinful impulse, to disclose sin as essentially unnatural and inhuman—Positive effect far more fully set forth in Christ's discourses—Sacrifice as the motive and goal of true religion—The communication of His spirit, the law of His own life to all who believe in Him—Christ's law of self-abnegation the moral law for all His followers—He that seeketh to save his life shall lose it, he that loseth shall find it unto eternal life—Gospel theory of life different from and more sublime than the theory of Altruism as popularly expounded—God's love and God's sacrifice the true source of living sacrifice in man—Thus salvation is sacrifice—Application of the whole subject—Postscript Pages 291-372
